Cover: Tight folds in thin Cenomanian dolomite beds at the base of the Chateau Neff Crusader fortress (12th century AD), northern Israel. The asymmetric folds are in the footwall of a west-dipping thrust fault, one of several faults that form a series of thrust duplexes at this locality. These structures are part of a "mini" fold-and-thrust belt adjacent to the western segments of the Dead Sea fault in northern Israel, and attest to a significant component of localized E–W shortening during the Plio-Pleistocene.
